Honeybees live together in a home called a hive. A hive may have thousands of bees, but only one queen. The queen lays the eggs. The worker bees do all the other jobs. They clean the hive, feed the young bees and guard the door.

Worker bees also fly out to flowers to collect a sweet juice called nectar. They carry it back and turn it into honey. While sitting on a flower, a bee gets yellow dust, called pollen, on its legs. When it flies to the next flower, some pollen falls there. This helps the plants to make seeds and fruits.

When a bee finds a good garden, it tells its friends by dancing. Its dance shows how far the flowers are and in which direction. Honeybees are small, but they are very hardworking and helpful to us.
