Why We Need Forests

A forest is much more than a crowd of trees. It is a home for thousands of animals, birds, insects and plants, all living together. Tigers, deer, monkeys and snakes find food and shelter among the trees, and even the tiny creatures under the fallen leaves have an important part to play.

Forests also give us many useful things. We get wood, fruits, honey, medicines and gum from them. The roots of trees hold the soil firmly, so that heavy rain does not wash it away. Trees take in carbon dioxide and give out oxygen, which we need to breathe. For this reason forests are often called the ‘lungs of the Earth’.

Sadly, forests are being cut down to make roads, houses and farms. When trees disappear, animals lose their homes, the soil gets washed away and the weather becomes hotter. We can help by planting saplings, using paper carefully and never wasting wood. One tree planted today can give shade and fresh air for a hundred years.

(i) A forest is a home for: 1

(a) only tigers (b) only birds
(c) animals, birds, insects and plants (d) only trees

The Rain Song

The rain is dancing on my roof,
Tap-tap, tap-tap, tap-tap!
It drums upon the window pane
And sings a silver song.

The frogs are croaking in the lane,
The peacock spreads his wings,
The thirsty fields drink deep and long
And every green leaf sings.

I'll wear my yellow raincoat, Mum,
And splash in every pool,
I'll sail a paper boat or two
Before I go to school!
