The Ship of the Desert

The camel is called the ‘ship of the desert’, and the name suits it well. Just as a ship carries people across the sea, a camel carries people and heavy loads across hot, sandy deserts where no other animal can survive for long.

Its body is wonderfully made for desert life. The camel's broad, flat feet do not sink into the sand. Its long eyelashes and thick eyebrows protect its eyes from the blowing dust, and it can close its nostrils during a sandstorm. The hump on its back stores fat, not water as many people think. When food is scarce, the camel's body uses this fat for energy. A thirsty camel can drink as much as a hundred litres of water in just a few minutes.

In Rajasthan camels are used to pull carts, to carry goods and, during the Pushkar Fair, they are decorated and shown to visitors from all over the world. Tourists enjoy camel safaris in the golden sands near Jaisalmer. For many families in the desert, the camel is not merely an animal but a dear friend.

The Old Well

Meera loved going to her grandmother's village during the summer holidays. Near the house stood an old well, covered with moss and surrounded by tall grass. Nobody used it any more, for the village now had a hand pump.

One afternoon Meera peeped inside the well. At the bottom she saw a glimmer of light. Was it treasure? She called her cousin Arun, and together they tied a bucket to a rope and lowered it down. When they pulled it up, they found nothing but a shining steel plate, green with age.

Disappointed, they went to Grandmother. She laughed kindly. 'That plate belonged to my mother,' she said. 'It fell in many years ago. You have found a treasure after all, for it holds a memory.' She washed the plate and polished it until it shone. That evening she served dinner on it, and Meera thought it was the most precious thing she had ever seen.
