The Postman and the Letter

Long before telephones and mobile phones, people sent news through letters. A letter written in Jaipur could travel to Chennai by train and reach the receiver in a few days. The person who made this possible was the postman.

In India the postal service began more than two hundred years ago, and today it is one of the largest in the world. There are about one and a half lakh post offices, many of them in tiny villages. The postman walks, cycles or rides a boat to deliver letters, money orders and parcels. In the hills he may climb steep paths, and in the desert he may ride a camel.

Every letter has an address written on it, and a pin code, a six-digit number that tells the post office the exact area of delivery. The stamp pasted on the envelope shows that the postage has been paid. Even today, when we send messages by phone in a second, a handwritten letter or a birthday card brings a special joy that no screen can give.

My Little Bicycle

My little bicycle is red,
With a shiny silver bell,
It takes me down the garden path
And round the old stone well.

It whirls me past the cows and carts,
It races with the breeze,
And when I ring my bell, the birds
Fly up from all the trees.

At night it rests beside the door,
Its wheels are still and slow,
I pat its seat and whisper, ‘Friend,
Tomorrow, off we go!’
