Makar Sankranti

On 14 January the sky over many Indian cities becomes a colourful garden of kites. This is Makar Sankranti, a festival that marks the day when the sun begins its journey towards the north. People celebrate it in different ways in different states. In Gujarat it is called Uttarayan, in Tamil Nadu Pongal, and in Punjab Lohri comes just the day before.

In Jaipur the festival has a special charm. From early morning, families climb onto their rooftops with kites, thick strings and bags of sweets. Loudspeakers play cheerful songs and children shout ‘Wo kata!’ whenever they cut another kite. The sweets of the day are til ladoos and gajak, made with sesame seeds and jaggery, which keep the body warm in the winter cold.

Kite-flying is fun, but it needs care. Some strings are coated with glass powder, and they can hurt birds and passers-by. Wise children use cotton strings, avoid flying kites near electric wires and wear caps to protect themselves from the sun. A festival is truly happy only when it harms no one.

The Sparrow's Nest

A sparrow had built a small nest in the corner of Mohan's balcony. Every morning Mohan watched her carry twigs and bits of cotton, one at a time, in her tiny beak. Soon there were three little eggs in the nest.

One windy night a storm shook the building. In the morning Mohan ran to the balcony and found the nest tilted dangerously, and one egg was missing. The mother sparrow sat nearby, chirping sadly.

Mohan thought for a moment. He took an old shoebox, cut a small round hole in it and tied it firmly in the corner. Then, very gently, he moved the nest with the two eggs inside. He sprinkled some grain and filled a saucer with water. The sparrow watched from a distance. After a while she hopped into the box and settled over the eggs. A few days later, two little chicks were chirping from the box, and Mohan could not stop smiling.
