Stepwells of Rajasthan

In the dry land of Rajasthan, where rain is scarce, people long ago found clever ways to store water. One of the most beautiful of them is the baori, or stepwell. A stepwell is a deep well with a flight of steps that goes down to the water, so that people can walk down easily even when the water level is low.

The Chand Baori in Abhaneri, near Jaipur, is among the deepest and most famous stepwells in India. It has about thirteen storeys and thousands of narrow steps arranged in neat patterns. The air at the bottom is cooler than the air above by several degrees, and travellers used to rest there during the heat of the day. Stepwells were not only for water; they were also meeting places where people talked, prayed and held small festivals.

Today many stepwells are neglected and filled with rubbish. Some have been cleaned and protected by the government and by local people. Visitors from all over the world come to admire the carvings and the pattern of the steps. Stepwells teach us that wise people of the past respected water and built with beauty as well as purpose.

The Little Seed

A little seed lay in the ground,
So small, so brown, so still,
It heard the raindrops tap and tap
And woke up with a thrill.

It pushed a shoot towards the light,
It sent a root below,
And day by day, in wind and sun,
It learnt to grow and grow.

Now see a tree, so green and tall,
With birds in every bough,
The seed that once was small and brown
Is a mighty giant now!
