The Joy of Reading

A book is a window that opens on the whole world. When we read, we can sail across oceans with a sailor, climb mountains with an explorer or travel into space with an astronaut, and all this without leaving our chair. Readers learn new words, think more clearly and write better than those who rarely read. Most importantly, a good book gives us company in moments when we feel alone.

Yet many children today spend more time with phones and television than with books. Screens are not bad in themselves, but they ask us to sit back and watch, while a book asks us to imagine. When we read about a forest, we must draw the trees and the birds in our own minds. This exercise makes the imagination strong, just as running makes the legs strong.

Developing the habit of reading is not difficult. One can begin with just ten minutes each day, choosing stories about subjects that one enjoys. A library card is free in many places, so cost need not stop anyone. Parents and teachers can help by reading aloud and by letting children choose their own books. A child who learns to love books carries a treasure that can never be stolen.

(i) The writer compares a book to: 1

(a) a mirror (b) a ladder (c) a window (d) a door

The Clay Horse

In a small village by the river lived an old potter named Haridas. Every morning he sat at his wheel and made pots, lamps and toys of clay. The best of his toys was a little horse with a proud neck and bright painted eyes. He kept it on the shelf and would not sell it to anyone.

One day a poor boy called Gopal stood outside the shop for a long time. His clothes were torn, but his eyes were fixed on the clay horse. "Do you like it?" asked the potter. Gopal nodded. "I have only two coins," he said, "but my sister is ill, and I wished to bring her something to smile at."

Haridas looked at the boy and then at the horse. For a moment he said nothing. Then he took the horse down, wrapped it in a cloth and put it in Gopal's hands. "Keep your coins," he said, "and take it home." The boy ran off with shining eyes.

A week later the village fair was held. The potter's shop was crowded as never before, for Gopal's sister had shown the horse to all her friends, and every child wanted one. That day Haridas sold more toys than he had in a whole year. He smiled and said to himself, "A kindness never goes empty-handed."
