Safe on the Road

Every year thousands of people are hurt in road accidents, and many of these could be avoided if everyone followed a few simple rules. The first rule for a pedestrian is to walk on the footpath. Where there is no footpath, one should walk on the right side of the road, facing the traffic, so that vehicles coming from the front can be seen in time. Roads should be crossed only at zebra crossings or where the signal is green for pedestrians.

Traffic lights use three colours. Red means 'stop', yellow means 'get ready', and green means 'go'. Drivers who jump a red light put themselves and others in great danger. A person riding a two-wheeler must wear a helmet, and passengers in a car should fasten their seat belts. Children below a certain age should never be allowed to drive.

Good road sense is a habit that must be learnt early. Schools can help by organising road safety weeks and by inviting traffic police officers to talk to students. At home, parents should set an example by following the rules themselves. A few seconds saved by breaking a rule can cost a life, but a few seconds spent in waiting can save one.

(i) A pedestrian should cross the road at: 1

(a) a petrol pump (b) any bend
(c) a zebra crossing (d) the middle of the road

(ii) The yellow light in a traffic signal means: 1

(a) turn back (b) go (c) stop (d) get ready

(iii) Where there is no footpath, one should walk: 1

(a) in the middle (b) on the left with traffic behind
(c) behind a vehicle (d) on the right side facing the traffic

(iv) State whether True or False: Riders of two-wheelers must wear helmets. 1

(a) True (b) False

(v) Which is the best title for the passage? 1

The Last Bus

Arjun stood at the bus stop with his school bag and an umbrella. It was nearly seven in the evening, and the rain had been falling since afternoon. He had stayed back for the science club meeting, and now the streets were almost empty. A cold wind blew, and the streetlights flickered on one by one.

At last the headlights of the last bus shone through the rain. Arjun was about to step in when he noticed a small girl sitting on the bench, hugging a wet bag and trying hard not to cry. "I have missed my bus," she said in a trembling voice. "I do not know the way home."

Arjun thought for a moment. If he helped the girl, he would reach home late, and his mother would worry. But he could not leave a child alone in the dark. He asked her where she lived. It was a lane close to his own colony. "Come with me," he said, and held the umbrella over her head.

They rode together, and Arjun walked her to her door. Her father hugged her tightly and thanked him again and again. When Arjun reached his own house, his mother was waiting anxiously at the gate. She listened to the whole story and then said softly, "I am not angry. I am proud of you."
