The Ship of the Desert

The camel is one of the few animals that can live comfortably in the hot, dry desert. Its body is perfectly suited to such a life, which is why it is often called 'the ship of the desert'. A camel can walk for many days across the sand with very little water. It does not store water in its hump, as many people think. The hump is a store of fat, which gives the animal energy when food is hard to find.

The camel has several other useful features. Its wide, soft feet do not sink in the sand. Its long eyelashes and thick eyebrows protect its eyes from dust, and it can close its nostrils during a sandstorm. When it finds water, a thirsty camel may drink as much as a hundred litres in just a few minutes.

For centuries, people in desert regions such as Rajasthan have used camels to carry goods and travellers. Camel milk is nutritious, and camel hair is used to make blankets and ropes. Every November, thousands of visitors come to the Pushkar Fair to see the decorated camels and enjoy the races. Although trucks and jeeps are now common, the camel remains a loyal friend of the desert people.

The Lighthouse

On a rock beside the roaring sea
A lighthouse stands alone;
Its lamp is lit when daylight fades,
Its tower is tall as stone.

The ships come sailing through the dark,
They search for land and shore;
And through the fog its steady beam
Says, "Safe this way once more."

It never sails, it never sleeps,
Yet guides ten thousand boats;
It asks no thanks from any one
Of all the crews it floats.

O may I be a lighthouse too,
In times of storm and night,
And lend to those who lose their way
A little steady light.

(i) The lighthouse stands: — 1

(a) in a city (b) on a mountain peak
(c) on a rock beside the sea (d) in a forest

(ii) When is the lamp lit? — 1
