A good night's sleep is often treated as a luxury, yet it is closer to a basic need. During sleep the body repairs its tissues, the brain sorts what it has learned during the day, and the mind prepares itself for fresh thoughts. A student who sleeps for six hours or less may feel that she has gained extra time, but the truth is that she has borrowed it from tomorrow. Memory weakens, tempers shorten and small tasks begin to feel heavy.

Doctors suggest that teenagers need between eight and ten hours of sleep. The difficulty is that bright screens in the evening trick the brain into believing that it is still daytime. A phone held close to the face at eleven at night can delay sleep by an hour or more. Many young people therefore lie awake with tired eyes and a restless mind.

The remedy is a gentle routine. Going to bed at the same hour each night, switching off screens half an hour before sleeping, and reading a few pages of a printed book are small habits that train the body to relax. Light dinners and a short walk in the evening help as well. None of these steps costs money, yet together they can change how a person feels in the morning.
