Water seems to be everywhere, yet the amount that humans can actually drink is small. About ninety-seven per cent of the Earth's water is in the oceans and is too salty for use. Most of the remainder is frozen at the poles or lies deep underground. A very small portion in rivers, lakes and shallow wells serves the needs of billions of people.

In many Indian cities, taps run for an hour or two each day, and families store water in tanks and buckets. In villages, women and children often walk long distances to fetch a pot or two. When rain fails, wells dry up and farmers lose their crops. These are not distant problems; they touch every home.

Fortunately, ordinary people can help. Fixing a leaking tap can save thousands of litres in a year. Collecting rainwater from rooftops refills wells and keeps groundwater alive. Reusing the water used for washing vegetables to water plants costs nothing. Schools can teach children to switch off a running tap while brushing their teeth. A country that saves its water saves its future.
