The humble bicycle is making a quiet comeback. In many cities, people who once travelled by car have begun to ride to work, to the market and to school. The reasons are simple. A bicycle needs no fuel, takes little space and produces no smoke. It also keeps the rider fit, which no car can promise.

City planners are noticing the trend. Some have marked special lanes where cycles can move safely, away from fast traffic. Others have set up stands where a person can hire a cycle for an hour and leave it at another stand. Such schemes have already cut the number of short car trips in a few cities.

Yet cycling is not free of troubles. In crowded roads without lanes, riders fear accidents. Rain and heat make long rides tiring, and thieves target unlocked cycles. If cycling is to grow, authorities must make roads safer and citizens must show consideration to riders. A cycle may be small, but the change it promises is large.
