The great banyan tree in many Indian villages is more than a tree. Its roots drop from the branches and become new trunks, so that one tree can cover the area of a small field. Birds nest in it, cattle rest beneath it and the village elders often hold their meetings in its shade.

Trees give more than shade. They absorb carbon dioxide, release oxygen and cool the air around them. A single tree can hold the soil with its roots so that heavy rain does not wash it away. Forests act like sponges, soaking up rainwater and releasing it slowly into streams.

Yet each year we lose large stretches of forest for roads, mines and buildings. Planting a sapling is easy; making it survive is harder. A sapling needs water in summer, a guard against cattle and love for several years. The best way to celebrate a birthday or an anniversary is to plant a tree and promise to look after it. Such a promise, kept for ten years, may be the most useful gift one ever gives.
