Language is the thread that ties a community's memory together. Words carry the names of crops, the rhythm of festivals and the secrets of games played by children long ago. When a language disappears, an entire way of seeing the world goes with it.

India has twenty-two scheduled languages and hundreds of mother tongues. Some, like Hindi and Tamil, are spoken by millions. Others are spoken by only a few thousand people in remote valleys. Linguists warn that several of the smaller ones may vanish within a generation because young people shift to languages that offer jobs and wider reach.

Preserving a language does not mean rejecting others. A child can speak her mother tongue at home, learn the language of her state at school and use English in higher studies. Each one opens a different door. Schools can keep folk songs, proverbs and stories of the locality alive in assemblies and festivals. Families can tell bedtime stories in the old tongue. A language that is spoken and sung will not easily die.
